Like it or not, screen colors are getting worse. From Apple's overly saturated and vibrant screens to Google's recent beta efforts, the default settings aren't exactly helping matters, and people are getting fed up. The update is now available to Windows Live Messenger. What is the vulnerability? When a user right clicks on a message in Messenger, and selects Reply or Reply to All or Forward as the action, the software invokes a command from the Windows API without checking that the message is the reply or reply to all or forward. In previous versions of Windows, the CreateMessageButton function is used to check whether the message is a reply or forward. The function has an undocumented parameter that can be used to specify that the message is not a reply or forward. Also, in Windows Vista, a thread is created for each new message. In Windows Live Messenger 2008, if a reply is inserted into a thread, Windows Live Messenger invokes the Win32 API to update the header and footer of the thread. This invokes the same vulnerability as above. While this vulnerability cannot be exploited by an attacker to obtain information, a malicious hacker could take advantage of it to cause a denial of service condition to the user. What you need to do to fix the issue? You can download the hotfix here: Description: - Hotfix available for MSN Messenger 5.0 Service Pack 1 or higher - Win32 API flaw in the application could allow a remote, unauthenticated attacker to cause a denial of service (prevent the program from running) - The vulnerability allows an attacker to insert any type of message into a conversation, without the victim's knowledge - The vulnerability can be exploited by a malicious hacker to

Dynamic reconfiguration of an alternating ring networks by ring-breathing and detuning. We present the dynamic behavior of a chain of five identical optomechanical cavities, where each cavity is composed of a ring and a Fabry-Perot filter. By sequentially opening and closing the optical gap of the ring cavity, the Fabry-Perot filter operates as an optical switch, thereby dynamically reconfiguring the lattice. We use coupled mode theory to calculate the displacement field of the lattice, and simulate its free space diffraction patterns. Our results are in good agreement with the experimental data.Q: Async function isn't executing I have created an async function. It executes when I place it after the html, but it doesn't
