Best file formats When you save photos in either Lightroom or Photoshop, you may have noticed that there are different formats included. Lightroom does not store the image directly on your hard drive or computer as a jpeg. Instead, it saves it as a tagged image file format (TIFF), a format that stores images using quite a bit of space. Photoshop saves the images directly in the file format of your choice. When you

ly I know I know, I am so late with the newsletter! I have been pretty swamped and havent had the energy to post about my current projects. However, I am finally on a break and have time to do some spinning. I got my first orders for these pin-up aviators and I am so excited! They are made from vintage pieces of china, glass and in one case an old demijohn. Here's the story behind them, from bella, the owner of the company. "Spribely is also a very special label for me and it represents the personal evolution of my life, after a bad diagnosis for skin cancer. I am now totally healed and I work every day to pay back to my carrier my joy, my motivation and my happiness! My motto is : I am once again and forever "Spribely". I thank my almighty God with all my heart and Soul for bringing me back to life, but also my customers for their love and their trust in my creative products!" We hope you enjoy the pictures and I hope you're having a great weekend!! Q: How do I produce a modified local-time date/time with the timezone offset of longitude/latitude? I have a server program that accepts longitude/latitude values and a time (timezone offset in seconds) at run time (inputed by the user) and needs to output the local time with the timezone offset. What would be the best way to go about this? I'm asking because I don't want to add more dependencies to my program. I am using PHP 5.2 (if that matters). A: Try this: date_default_timezone_set("America/New_York"); $timestamp = strtotime("-5 days", time()); A: The best way to do this is by using a combination of the gettimeofday PHP function and the date functions. For example: $tz = new DateTimeZone('Europe/London'); $datetime = new DateTime("now", $tz); echo $datetime->format('Y-m-d H:i:s P'); This will output this string: 2011-05-05 14:43:29 BST You can change 'now' into the PHP microtime() function and alter the output to your liking. You can also set the DateTimeZone in which you are setting your date. For example, in the above example, "Europe/London" is the TZID to set the timezone to. If I wanted to change this I would do so as follows: $tz->setName('Europe/London'); Color+Tile+Pattern+Handmade+Design+Pattern=⬜⬜⬜⬜⬜⬜⬜

Q: Strict or Indiscriminate Application of Technical Wording? Some of these words are the nature of English words and sometimes their technical meaning isn't as clear as (for instance) a military or scientific term. Is it better to use the word for a strictly English style and just be plain wrong, or to be vague and technically correct but miss the intended overall meaning? As an example of what I'm talking about, here are a few options: transmit transmitted transfer transferred transferred injected applied This is a consideration for both programming and technical writing. Any thoughts on the subject? A: The question is very open-ended and subjective. That can make this a very hard question to answer, as there is no one-size-fits-all answer. That said, I have a couple of opinions. First, and most importantly, this is part of writing, and as such, should follow the general rules of writing. In this case, the rules are pretty clear. You have a verb, a subject, and a noun. That's it. If you want to make sure you're correct, use the correct term. If you can't do that, then you have to choose the term that seems best to you. As a side note, this is not the only case where the term you use can differ from what some readers think. For example, consider the phrase 'to make snot.' Some people understand that phrase as referring to making either snot or mucus out of something. To them, the 'to' is the implicit -ative form. Others use that term to refer to using a snot-making machine. To these people, the 'to' is the infinitive. In my opinion, neither of these is clearly wrong. In writing, it's your call to make. Now, one of the most common problems with writing is when a writer doesn't realize that there are different ways of saying something, and while they have different senses, they have the same meaning. This usually has to do with some discussion that the writer had with a friend or colleague. For example, they might be talking about the previous weekend, and have an ambiguous term like 'maintain'. To them, 'maintain' means to continue to do something, while to
