Facebook is working on a new payment system called Facebook Credits that will be used by game developers to buy virtual goods using real money. And now, Facebook has reportedly already turned on the new functionality in the Facebook mobile app. Re/code reports Facebook is using a test version of Facebook Credits with selected developers that can be redeemed for virtual goods. Game developers who successfully integrate the system into their games will be able to sell goods such as extra lives or in-game currency for players. Facebook will keep the money that users spend on these games in Facebook Credits. All of this is done in the Facebook app to minimize the user experience of the rest of the app. Before the user can redeem an in-game item, the Facebook app must sync or sign in to a game using Facebook's Open Graph protocol. Once the app has completed the connection, a Facebook Credits option will pop up in the user's mobile Facebook app with the item that can be redeemed. While some developers already have games that use the API for in-game purchases, Facebook's mobile app update is unlikely to be used for social games such as Mafia Wars or the FarmVille game. Instead, Facebook has cited "great in-game content experiences" such as Micro Empires, the title being developed by a company called Impulsiv that Facebook acquired in October. Facebook is spending $900 million to acquire Impulsiv and another social gaming startup called Zynga. "We've been working on a new payment system for some time, and it just makes sense to roll d0c515b9f4
