Update #7: Added character workup â€" i.e. adding theQ: Is a random number generated from the password of a strong password system? By a strong password system, we are talking about the passwords that are generated by a hash function. Basically what is the default salt of the random number generator used in PHP's crypt() function? If there's no salt at all, how can we prevent the random number generator from being generated by the password? The password is hashed, and the hash is presented to the user. If the random number generator is generated from the password, we could just reverse the encryption process to get the password. A: A strong password system usually will save a salted hash of the password, which should be regenerated and salted on each use. So, basically, the password and salt are not used to generate the random number, it is already generated before the password is used to perform the encryption (usually). A: The system is working as follows: password is hashed you can use the same hashing algorithm or a different one (depending on your needs) you save the hash and a random salt. you use the salt to generate another hash. So, the system does not regenerate anything. What this mean is that you have to know the algorithm and you need to store the salt somewhere. The question is actually, can you regenerate the salt? and the answer is no. Cryptography has laws. If you have an unique crypted password, y
