So my program looks something like this: `def function_A(): ... data = inputs function_B() ...` Is it possible to store the values of the inputs in a global/constant variable? like: `global inputs inputs = 'input_value' function_A() ...` That way I can check the input value in `function_A` and skip the `function_B` if the input is not the one I want. A: This is the best solution I can think of: `import datetime global __clock __clock = datetime.datetime.now() inputs = " def function_A(): ... while True: try: if inputs!= datetime.datetime.now(): function_B() break except Exception as e: print "Error: ",e` It can run for long, but I think that it is ok to run for a while. It's always nice to share something you're working on, something you find useful, or maybe even something that makes your week a little easier. This is useful from the developer's perspective as it provides a stable framework on which to build, with the knowledge that when you make any changes, they will be consistent throughout the application. Livin is an inhibitor of apoptosis that is initially cloned from rat haemopoietic cells. In this study we identified and investigated the expression of a homologue of livin in neoplasms, except for human haemopoietic tumours. To identify human livin we have developed a specific antibody (LoBIC8) which recognizes both the short (221 bp) and the long (374 bp) forms of human livin. This antibody recognizes a protein band of the expected molecular weight on Western blots of several human neoplasms. In addition, all human tumour cell lines tested react with LoBIC8 except for human haemopoietic tumours.

Northern blot analysis indicates that human livin is expressed in a majority of non-haemopoietic tumours examined. RT-PCR showed
