the canoe will probably have to be disassembled and the cracks filled with whatever materials are lying around and/or available. it may be difficult to do this if more than a few cracks are involved. a jig can be made of scrap wood and clamps to hold the canoe in place while cracks are filled. the cracks should be opened up with a knife or other tool and then filled with epoxy or fiberglass resin. for those with fiberglass gunwales, the inside of the crack may have to be masked off with plastic sheeting. these materials will help restore the canoe back to its original shape. if the cracks are very small, a can of spray-on urethane can be used to fill them. in most cases, a canoe is more susceptible to cold cracks in winter than summer. it is not uncommon for a boat to lose some material when paddling in cold or brackish water. the hull and gunwales expand when paddling in warm, saltwater and the material can move enough to cause a cold crack. obviously, during the winter months, the boat is much more susceptible to cold cracks due to hull contraction. a cold crack can be identified by its vertical orientation. if the crack in the hull is horizontal, it is probably not a problem. if it is vertical, it is probably a cold crack. if you observe a series of 6 or more vertical cracks, it could indicate a problem with the canoe. if more than a few cracks are involved, it may be difficult to close them all up. the cracks may have to be filled with epoxy or fiberglass resin. for those with fiberglass gunwales, the inside of the crack may have to be masked off with plastic sheeting. this can be a tedious and time consuming process. although canoe manufacturers have taken steps to minimize the problem, cold cracks can occur at any time of the year. one should take steps to prevent cold cracks from occurring. it is imperative that the canoe be stored dry and free of condensation (if possible).

when storing a canoe, try to keep it away from cold and hot temperatures. keep it in a dry, unventilated place. if possible, don't store it in the sun or near heaters. this will help keep the canoe from contracting and expanding and allowing for cracks. if a canoe cracks, get it repaired as quickly as possible. it is quite possible that cracks will only appear during winter months. if the cracks are very small, a can of spray-on urethane can be used to fill them. however, this material should not be used to fill cracks that extend into the interior of the hull. a canoe may be repaired by replacing the gunwales, or replacing the rails or the entire hull. if the crack is large, the hull may have to be discarded. after the crack is repaired, the canoe should be stored and paddled for a while before using it again. for best results, the boat should be transported to a repair shop or building where it will be inspected by a repairman. some canoe manufacturers have repair kits that include epoxy, fiberglass resin, and instructions. this is a good idea for those who have had a canoe repaired and want to know how they can do it themselves.

the use of crack cocaine by white inner-city residents has had more of a political impact than the use of crack by african-americans, latinos, and other minorities. since the late 1980s, reports of crack use by whites have been used as evidence of the drug's "contagion" and "racism," especially by liberal and progressive groups. where a black or latino person with "crack" is a political symbol of urban blight and inner-city decline, a white person taking or using crack is simply a "victim" of a drug problem. drug-related crimes are assumed to be problems of poverty and lack of opportunity; the drug problem of white users is presented as a moral problem. in this sense, the political activism of inner-city minorities has not been able to turn the tide of political opinion on inner-city crack cocaine.
