The fatal shooting on Wednesday was the first by an Anchorage officer in a decade. A 9mm pistol was found in the possession of the officer who shot and killed 34-year-old Gergory Schumann when the officer found him carrying a bag containing three knives. A medical examiner concluded that Schumann, who was not armed, died of a stab wound in his chest and had at least one other stab wound to his shoulder. "The officer was faced with a life-threatening situation," said Capt. Kelly George, in a news conference. He said the officer followed Schumann because he thought he might be carrying a gun. George said the officer was armed with a service weapon, and had been outfitted with a personal weapon after he found the pedestrian was unarmed. Schumann was trying to travel to a car rental in Anchorage, but instead of going to the rental location, he headed toward Whittier Street and ended up in the park, George said. "Schumann, the person who ran, stated that he was under the influence of alcohol and he also stated that he did not want to be in Alaska. He had made up his mind that he was not going to be here," he said. "Officer smelled alcohol and Schumann was unsteady when he tried to walk. He was stumbling and falling as he was walking," he said. "If the officer had followed up that direction and started walking with him, he would have had no problem. However, the officer did what he had to do to protect the community." George said Anchorage police have had a good track record with involving Alaskans with mental health issues. The officer who shot Schumann left a narrative statement with the Alaska State Troopers, the agency that investigates deadly officer-involved shootings in Alaska. George said that he would not release that officer's name. George said
