crazy question, but is there any reason why all three of Ranma's masks (the one on his face, the one on his arm, and the one he uses to change his clothes) have mouths? (And I'm specifically talking about the masks, not Ranma.) I know some clothing can, like when his pants are ripped and he changes into more pants, but are there other situations in which they are used? False. On the rare occasion a character is partially covered, but there's a mask beneath (or it's part of a magic) disguise (like in Ranma the Supernal), and the mask's mouth is only used for speech. Is it because he can't use his mouth under it? That would be very silly. In battle or any other circumstance where normal speech would be expected, the mask is perfectly effective. I think that everyone gets the problem with his eyes and how he's unable to use them to change. With the mouth it seems very logical, it wouldn't make sense to have a hole for the mouth in the costume, and from how it's used (with no indication of a mouth being possible, the first time he uses it in a fight scene, he has a mouth there but never speaks with it), it looks like he has to wear a special mask to change. With the eyes, it's not immediately obvious but if you think about it for a second, he can't change his eye color with them, can he? This is one of those problems that can be explained with the mouth but not the eyes. I think that everyone gets the problem with his eyes and how he's unable to use them to ridiculous costumes. The mouth is part of the mask. And it's how he changes his clothes. All of these masks have the same mouth.
