Lightroom has been updated to the new creativeLIVE cloud storage! Did you know Lightroom could also be a cloud storage system? This feature allows you to keep your files backed up seamlessly, do backups and even sync your edits between your devices. So the short answer to the introductory statement is yes: Lightroom can be a cloud storage Web service! This new update also changes the default way we're getting, storing and sharing the data. In the Preferences, you'll find (under "Lightroom Web storage")

"Lightroom store your photos, videos, and images to your Creative Clouds account,", "and automatically sync and share when you're working on your photos," in addition "Keep your collection up-to-date with the latest versions." After doing the backup you can always come back to your Lightroom and check up on how the editing will affect the photos on your computer. If you decide to preserve your images, you can choose "Upload to Creative Cloud," which will save your project in your Creative Cloud account. The changes in this version may be subtle, but they are well-rounded. They also happen to be things we need as frequent photographers. The critical improvements revolve around changing the Camera Raw plug-in in Lightroom. I actually prefer the old Camera Raw plug-in in Lightroom—I'm still using it—and I am glad at this new incarnation, if not a bit disappointed. First, there is a new Preview tool, which you can use to examine your adjustment precisely as you make it. It makes for a more fluid workflow since you don't have to wait for the entire import process to recalculate the adjustments before examining them. Lightroom also adds a new dialog box feature that lets you load many adjustments at once into one clipped area of an image. And yes, you get the chance to adjust Linear and HSL colors, but other variables such as hue, saturation, and luminance also come into play.
