I would also suggest some Adobe Camera Raw tutorials and more, such as tutorials on using Tone Curve, Lens Corrections, Spot Healing Brush, Layer Comps, and Location Masking. There are a million people who don't know how to use them, so they might find a lot of help in that area. If you're new to the big equipment and the capital it takes to run it better, you might want to consider learning it that way. In the long run, you can probably learn it much faster. Most good DSLRs should shoot in RAW format (and preferably the higher quality DNG format), so that's an area you should probably learn. I rarely edit any images in PS4, but maybe I should learn more about it. I will need to get a new computer and flash drive next year. I have a few upgrades in mind. I just have not committed to anything. I usually develop on a single machine. I think that's a bad idea -- I want to be able to take the system down and just boot it up and do my work from anywhere. Flash drives are so cheap. What's New in PSD In this release, Adobe has updated the text layers in PSD, making it faster to edit. It has also updated the background-clip selection of the types of objects you can use. You can now place the object inside another object like pillows, text boxes and place text boxes on curves. Previewing PSD files is now done in a split screen mode. You can now work on a PSD file, close it and open another without losing the changes you made. You can now copy, paste and undo changes made to a layer.

The web is mobile-first. Websites are first viewed on mobile. And, if you forget to make Photoshop for the web, you've left your users most likely viewed your site while they're on their phones. Adobe Photoshop originally launched on desktops and laptops, but they're not PCs anymore. They're laptops. And, more importantly, they're tablets. Often, tablet and laptop versions of Photoshop are already much smaller than a desktop version. And now, as Photoshop moves to the web, that size advantage will increase as the web version continues to be optimized for the web. Here's why you need Photoshop for graphic design:

- Ability to edit any document, image, or format
- Ability to model objects with a brush
- Ability to create complex 3D graphics
- Easily create web graphics, such as logos, websites, or logos.
- Create layered PDFs
- Highly customizable
- Edit photos and videos
- See Certificate of Authenticity
